Where you are today

You came to Auralis feeling persistently tired — the kind of tiredness that sleep doesn't seem to fix — and noticing that your energy, mood and digestion have all shifted since your daughter was born. You're doing everything you can think of, and you'd like a clearer, calmer path forward that fits a busy life.

This report gathers what you shared and turns it into a few honest observations and a realistic first plan. It is education and guidance for your wellbeing — a companion to, never a replacement for, your doctor's care.

The themes that stand out

THEME 01

Energy & recovery

Several small things — irregular meals, broken sleep, high demands — are likely compounding into the fatigue you're feeling.

THEME 02

Nourishment rhythm

Long gaps between meals and low protein at breakfast may be affecting your energy and cravings through the day.

THEME 03

Stress & nervous system

This life stage asks a lot of your nervous system; small daily moments of recovery can make a real difference.

The "why" behind the plan

When meals are spread out and low in protein, blood sugar tends to swing — which can show up as energy dips, cravings and low mood. Starting the day with a protein- and fibre-rich breakfast helps steady that curve, which is why it's the first small change we'll focus on.

Sleep and stress are deeply linked to how we feel and eat. You won't be able to control broken nights right now, but protecting even short, consistent moments of rest helps your nervous system recover — and the research here is genuinely strong.

IN ONE SENTENCE

Small, steady, realistic changes — not a dramatic overhaul — are what will move the needle for you right now.

Where to begin — in order

Step 01 • This week

A steadier breakfast

Aim for a breakfast with protein and fibre within an hour of waking — eggs, yoghurt, oats with seeds. One change, repeated daily.

Step 02 • This week

Ten minutes of rest

One small, protected pause each day — a short walk, breathing, or quiet. Consistency matters more than length.

Step 03 • Next 2–3 weeks

Even meal spacing

Gently close the longest gaps between meals so your energy has fewer dips. We'll refine this together as we go.

Step 04 • Ongoing

Notice & adjust

Keep a light note of energy and mood. We'll use what you notice to shape the next steps — this is a partnership, not a prescription.

Your safety comes first

●●● PLEASE CHECK IN WITH YOUR GP

Because persistent fatigue can sometimes have an underlying medical cause, I'd warmly encourage you to ask your doctor about a routine check (for example, iron, thyroid and vitamin D) — especially postpartum. Nothing in this report diagnoses or treats any condition, and if anything ever feels acute or worrying, please contact your doctor or, in an emergency, call 112. This guidance supports your medical care; it never replaces it.

Where we can go from here

You have everything you need to begin with the first two steps this week. If you'd like company and structure as you go, The Bloom — six weeks of guided support — is designed for exactly this moment, and would let us build on this plan together with regular check-ins.

Whatever you choose, it has been a real pleasure to put this together for you. I'm cheering you on.
